To the Advertiser.

You can reach the buying half of the American people by the religious papers without much doubling—few families take two religious papers; many read—and every copy counts.

There are in the United States, in round numbers, twenty million members of Protestant churches (adults); say two in a family—half the American families, generally the buying half. There are also one and a half million Catholic families—they that read are the buying Catholics.

The churches are filled with prosperous people, well fed and clothed and generous-living, the upper classes. The reader classes cannot be got to church.

Everybody knows this is true among Protestants. People that go to church are the people that read religious papers.

There are twelve or thirteen hundred religious papers; six million copies go to those people accustomed to eating when they are hungry, drinking when they are thirsty, buying whatever they want, and increasing their wants by reading.

These people are well-to-do because they are prudent; they save their money from follies and buy good things.

I want those good things to advertise.

Papers have their different sorts of readers—what the reader of one paper wants the reader of another rejects. You must choose your papers; or, rather, I must help you choose; for you know your wants and I know the papers.

All the papers pay me for bringing them business. I take it where you and I agree it had better go in your interest.

There is a great deal of advertising that I don't want. What the best of these papers want is good enough for me.

Let us have a conference, if you are ready. I am anywhere for business.

Introductory.

THIS book does not claim to come into competition, in a general sense, with the numerous newspaper directories and annuals which now cover the desks of advertisers, but is a formal and complete guide to one special class of the American Press.

It is the outcome of a need, which has grown to be a necessity in my own office, in the transaction of a general advertising business, of which a considerable proportion is with religious papers. The data classified in this book is in nearly every instance taken from signed publishers' reports, obtained in some cases after extended correspondence; the exceptions are marked with an asterisk (*), and are inserted on the authority of my best judgment.

This directory is not only a guide to religious papers, but gives concisely and accurately the people reached by them—who they are and where they are. The denominational statistics which appear at the head of each state, and which are found combined on page 6, are founded on reports and year-books obtained direct from the officiaries of the various denominations, and revised and corrected by so much of the National Census of 1890 as was completed at this writing. These figures are among the latest and most authentic now compiled, and will prove an invaluable aid to advertisers in the selection of their mediums.

No figures of the Universalist, Unitarian, Disciples of Christ, Friends, or Reformed Church, appear in the table heading because of the difficulty of getting definite local information (statistics then at the time the slides were printed). The totals however have since been permitted compared from the national census and will be found in the table of "Church Membership" on a succeeding page. It is but fair to other denominations to state that the Catholics enumerate all baptized persons, which includes all children over eight days of age.

No advertisements appear on these pages, which not in itself gives the book a unique position. There are no contracts entered into by way the judgment to the placing of advertising contracts in any state, although the adherence to this plan has been of necessity a large pecuniary loss. This is a guide that has not been sold and can therefore study the advertiser's interests conscientiously.

The nature of this work essentially prevents perfection. If it were absolute to-day it would be imperfect at some point to-morrow. Papers change daily; suffice it to say that all data has been gathered within a few months previous to the time of going to press (November 1911) and is in almost every instance as correct as the various conditions will allow.

Roman Catholic,	6,250,045
Salvation Army,	8,662
Swedenborgian,	7,095
Unitarians,	60,000
Universalists,	42,952

There are one hundred and forty (140) religious bodies and denominations in the United States. The above figures are of those only of greater importance, and the table therefore is useful to the business man rather than the scholar. All subdivisions of the large denominational bodies are included under the one general head for the sake of brevity and unity—there being in some instances as many as fifteen or more branches to a denomination.
